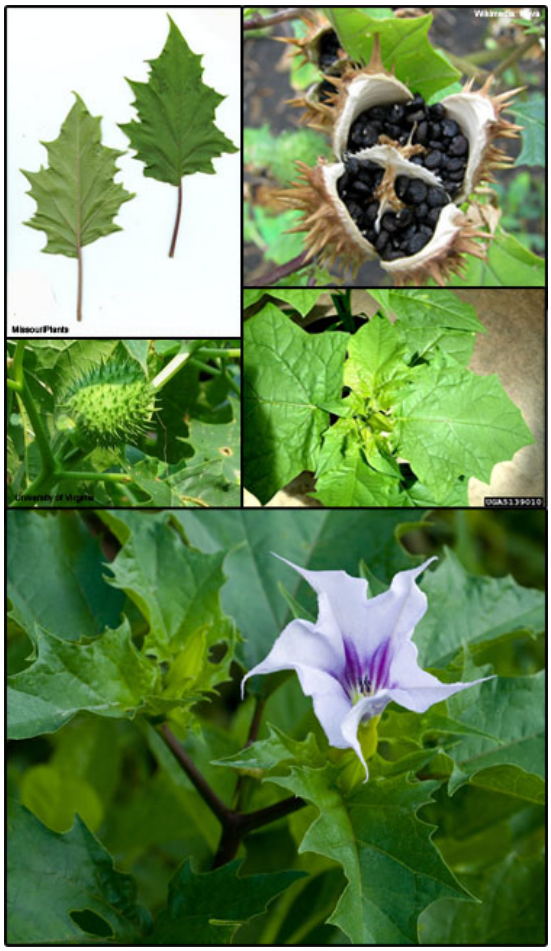
Datura the Devil's Weed

Research by Cyrus Trivin

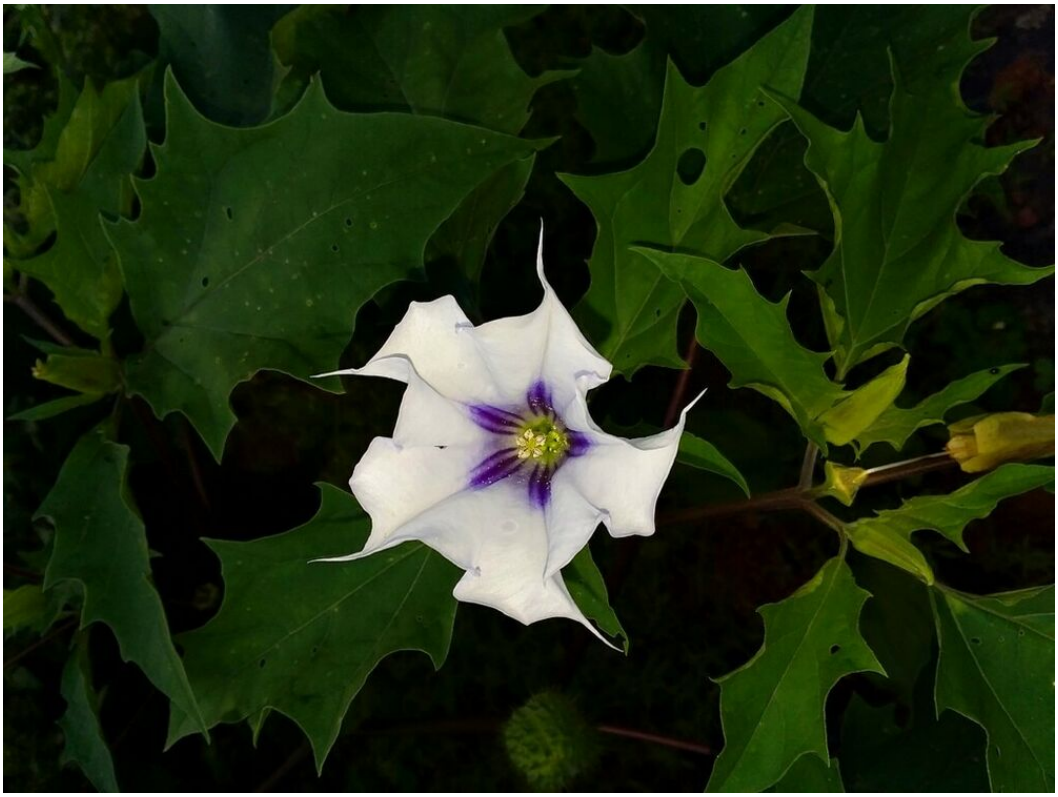
Datura the Devil's Weed

Research by Cyrus Trivin

Datura is also known as devil's trumpet, moonflower, jimsonweed, devil's weed, hell's bells, and thorn-apple. Datura is a member of the deadly nightshade flower family known as Solanaceae. Hallucinogenic deadly nightshade plants include Datura, Belladonna, Mandragora, Burgmansia (Angel Trumpets), and Henbane. Datura grows almost everywhere around the world except the arctic. Datura has a flower often appearing in white and purple with 5, 6, or 7 points. The flower has a beautiful spiral pattern as it blooms and takes the shape of a trumpet. The leaves of the plant look green and pointy while the stems appear as green and purple. The datura plant produces seed pods which have sharp thorns all over the surface hence the name thorn-apple. The seed pods start growing as green and turn brown as they mature opening up to expose brown or black seeds. Every part of the datura plant is poisonous with the seeds being the most potent part.



The deadly nightshade family of plants have been used for medicines, poison potions, witches ointments, and shamanic rituals as a form of pharmakia for many generations and are admired and respected plants amongst witches, wizards, warlocks, and shamans. In European witchcraft as far back as the 1400s these plants were used as ingredients to create what is known as witches flying ointment. Flying ointment was thought to be able to grant witches the supernatural ability to fly and experience spiritual journeys. Some modern occultists who have sought to recreate the flying ointment for their own use have lost their lives in the attempt to experiment with the mixture of these poisonous and toxic plants. Datura is considered a poisonous plant and a hallucinogenic delirium due to the presence of chemicals known as scopolamine, hyoscyamine, and atropine. The seeds and flowers of datura are especially potent psychoactives. The effects of being poisoned by datura includes blurred vision, dilation of the pupils, dryness of the mouth, difficulty in urinating, dizziness, headache, vomiting, blushing, fever, delirium, confusion, amnesia, hallucinations, psychosis, a rapid heart rate, and death.



Datura can open oneself up to a world of supernatural and paranormal experiences that feel much like a ghost haunting. Users have often reported their experiences as being very negative and terrifying. This is why the nicknames of the datura plant are associated with hell and the devil due to the sinister diabolic evil nature the experiences can induce. People will see and meet people who are not actually there who will carry on conversations with them for hours. These hallucinations of other people will appear to be as real as any other object in the world and usually embody the appearance of someone the experiencer knows from the past or someone they have met in real life. People can see shadow people and other autonomous entities including demonic beings under the effects of datura. People have reported seeing nests of insects and spiders in the corner of rooms including creatures such as roaches, spiders, and snakes crawling over their bodies. Users experience chronic amnesia often forgetting what had just happened a few minutes ago including forgetting that they have even taken the drug in the first place. Due to the delirious effects of the chemicals, experiencers will go on about the trip thinking that everything happening to them is completely normal, reacting to the hallucinations very casually despite everything happening to them being quite nightmarish and bizarre.

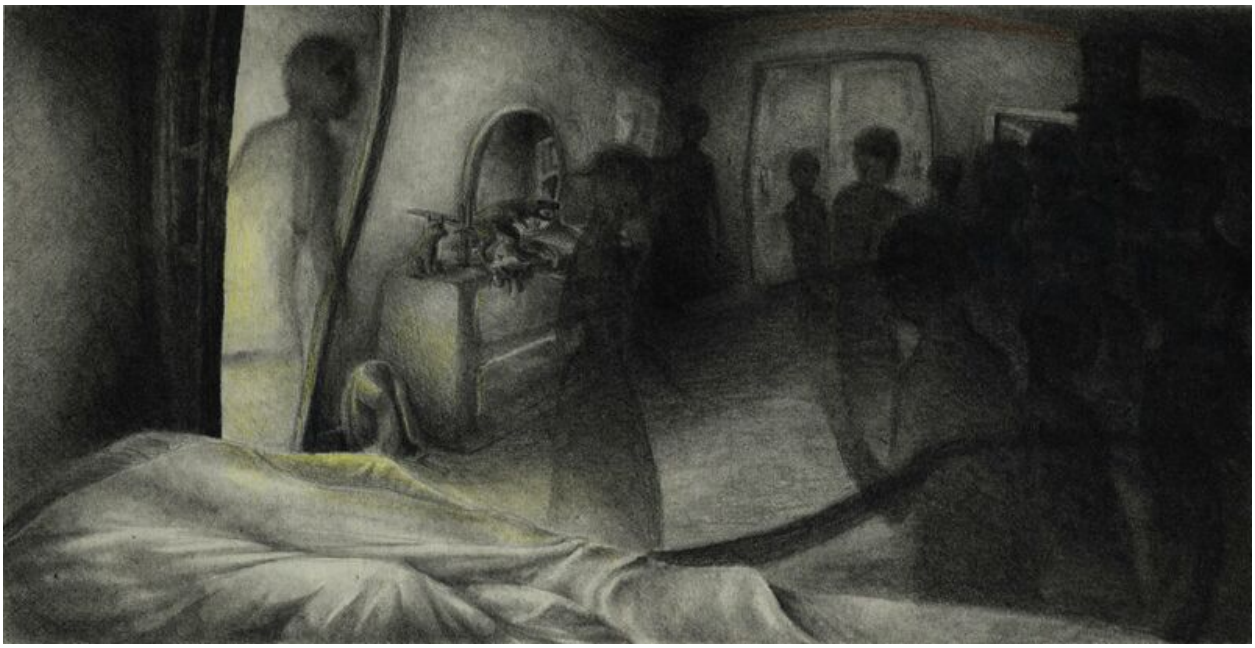
A user has reported under the influence of Datura seeds that every time they tried to drink water the water would turn into sand in their mouth and then they proceeded on a quest to find water that wouldn't turn into sand. Who knows whether or not what they were trying to drink was actually water or sand or something else entirely as they could literally hallucinate anything and it would appear as being real.

The CIA experimented with scopolamine in the 1960s for a short time using the drug as a truth serum during interrogation sessions. The CIA discontinued using scopolamine due to the negative side effects it produced in the victims and issues raised about the ethical use of such drugs. The reason that scopolamine was so effective as a truth serum is because the person under the effects of the drug becomes very open to suggestion and will perform tasks on command without any reservation or objection. Scopolamine has been used by criminals and gangs in countries such as Colombia in order to get victims to hand over their cash, credit cards, open up their homes to robbery, and empty their entire bank accounts. Due to the effects of the drug inducing amnesia and the inability to form new memories the victims would find themselves taken advantage of while having no memories of the experience. The criminal will trick the victim into taking scopolamine by either slipping it into their drink, having the victim smell a flower causing them to inhale the drug, handing the victim a business card that is laced with the drug causing them to become poisoned through their skin, or blowing the drug into the victim's face in a powdered form which is known as Devil's Breath. Scopolamine has also been used as a date rape drug and is considered more effective than other drugs due to the victim being highly suggestable and losing any memories of the encounter due to amnesia. Criminals also use scopolamine in abductions and kidnappings introducing the victim into the world of human sex trafficking where they become a sex slave for the profit of a corrupt criminal enterprise. Datura was also an ingredient used to create zombie powder in voodoo witchcraft practices in order to make a person become a subservient slave against their free will and better judgment. Devil's Breath can zombify a person in this way as they become easily susceptible to mind control. Using drugs to trick people against their will is a form of black magick and sinister sorcery. Black magick will result in serious negative repercussions to the dark sorcerer who uses such practices. What goes around comes around and the spiritual consequences of knowingly harming innocent people is dire within the higher dimensional spiritual realms of reality.

Ayahuasca Shamans warn against the madness of Datura Shamans. Ayahuaska shamanism is a highly respected practice in many cultures throughout the world. Datura shamanism is considered much more dangerous as people who abuse this plant often enter into a state of never ending madness and insanity sometimes thinking that they themselves are God while acting psychotic and displaying strange behaviors in public. While the chemical known as DMT (Dimethyltryptamine) will send the experiencer into heavenly realms of geometrical fractal beauty often encountering divine angelic types of entities, the chemical known as Scopolamine will send the experiencer into the demonic realms of hell, a nightmare realm of death and chaos often encountering sinister demonic types of entities. Some shamans have been known to include datura within their ayahuasca brews due to the fact that many western tourists who are looking for an authentic shamanic initiation ceremony are often looking for more of the visual wonders of the psychedelic experience more so than the healing properties, shadow work, and self reflection aspect of it. This corrupted shamanic practice has lead many spiritual seekers down a dark road of negative consequences including death and psychosis. Anyone who is looking for an authentic ayahuasca ceremony experience should question the shaman to make sure that they do not add any extra unnecessary ingredients into their ayahuasca brews such as datura, belladonna, and tobacco.

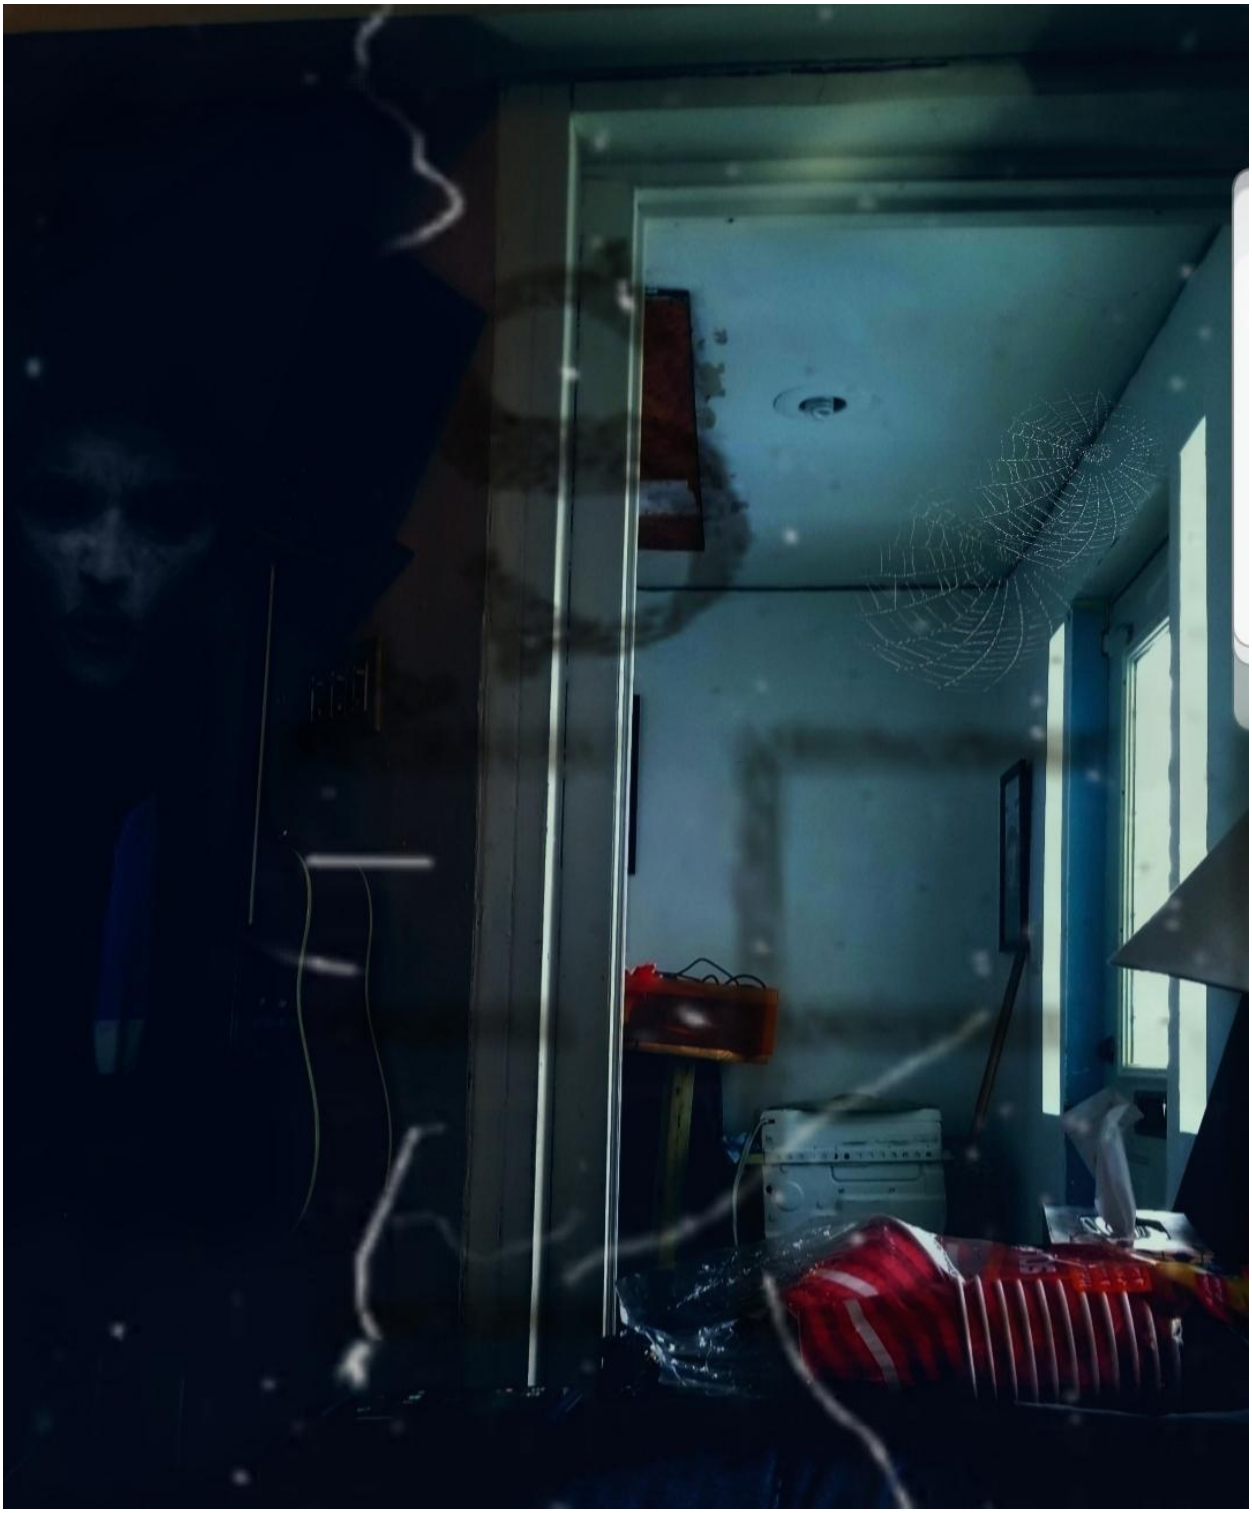
People who ingest this extremely poisonous datura plant run the risk of dying, entering into a coma, suffering a permanent state of psychosis, losing the ability to perform simple tasks such as reading and writing, and many other negative permanent side effects. It is suggested that if you have one of these plants growing in your yard that you remove it quickly especially if you have young children who play nearby. If you are going to handle one of these plants for any reason it is recommended that you wear gloves as even just touching the leaves of the plant with your bare skin could send you on a mild hallucinogenic journey. The flowers of datura plants are very beautiful and visually striking so if you do plan on keeping some species of datura flowers in your garden as decoration just keep in mind the poisonous nature of these plants and respect how dangerous they can be if mishandled.

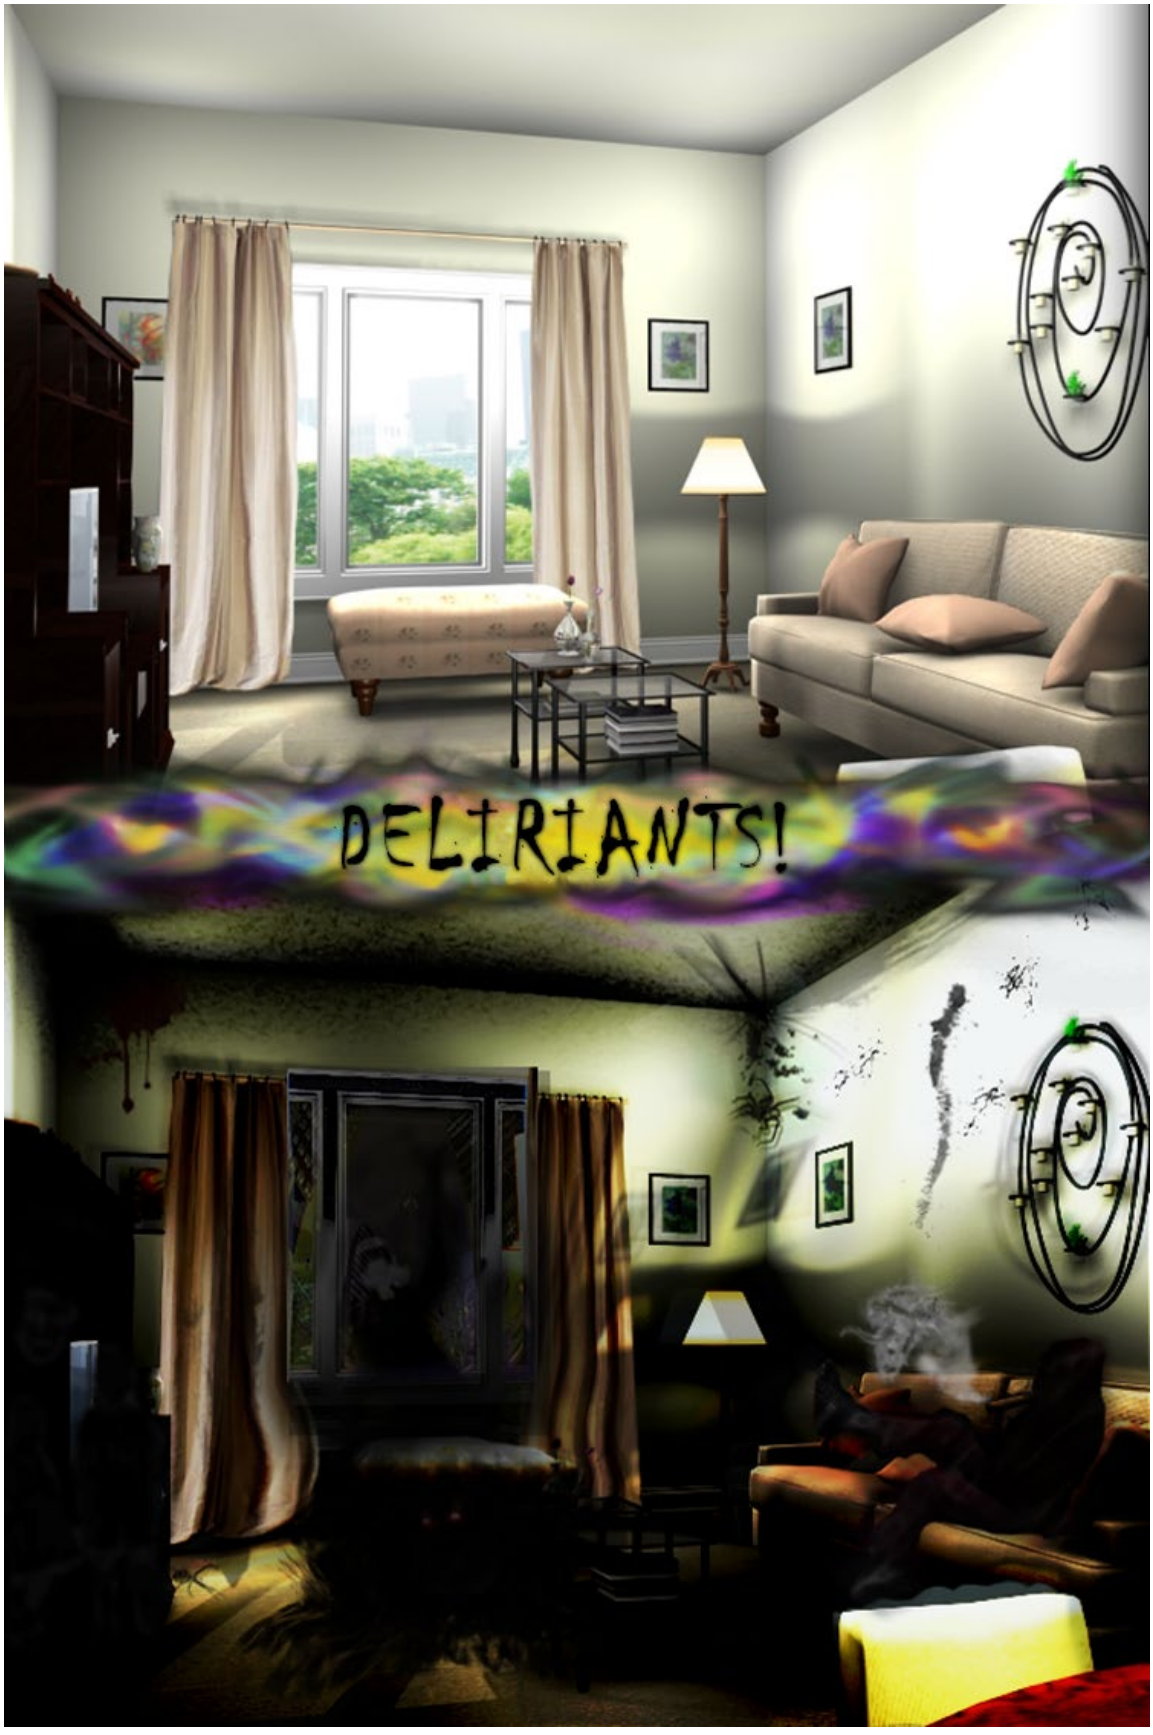
Cyrus Trivin



deliriants

2020





DELIRIANTS!